1863---GETTYSBURG---1913

BY CASSIE MONCURE LANE.

On Fane's eternal camping ground the reveille is beat,
And North and South are hurrying in friendship now to meet.
From Dixie Land they're coming—the remnant of the Gray,
And the Boys in Blue will greet them, but not in the old way.

Who fought so brave at Gettysburg when Pickett led the fray,
And the Boys in Blue will greet them, but not in the old way.
For Meade's and Sedgwick's guns are spiked—no more the cannons peal,
Since fifty years are long enough a nation's wound to heal.

What means this wondrous muster of our heroes of the past,
Who now meet in friendly conference—not to the bugle's blast?
The shadowy lines of Blue and Gray, marching side by side,
Is not to form a rampart or stem invasion's tide?

For pious and anvil take the place of bursting shell and steel,
Since fifty years are long enough a nation's wound to heal.

But as long as God's sky is blue, and till old Time turns gray,
Each side will guard her heroes until the judgment day.
Was the wreath of the giants—a noble nation's fight—
When each had thought the other wrong, that they alone were right?

Old scars are fast forgotten—Gettysburg is a sacred field,
Since fifty years are long enough a nation's wound to heal.

Pennsylvania, Keystone of the Union, curious to relate,
Cohort of near-loving Quakers, trace a wondrous fate.
Fame's calendar, one old July, binds Independence Bell;
A century later it sounded the Confederate knell.

But now in glorious peace peacans all the bells must peal,
Since fifty years are long enough a nation's wound to heal.
